

APPLIED CLAIRVOYANCE AND CLAIRAUDIENCE

OLGA WORRALL (U.S.A.)

It is rather difficult to describe the sensations that are felt in a state of receiving. In clairaudience, the top of the head feels as though it were open and as if a funnel-shaped light extruded from the spot known as the fontanel. In a clairvoyant state the forehead feels wide open. The eyes play an unimportant role in "seeing;" the center of attraction is what is "seen" with the forehead. Persons and scenes appear much like a movie, but without the screen. Sometimes there is color, and sometimes only black and white.

During a clairaudient state, different voice intonations are intensified. Lispings, accents, and foreign words all become understandable.

The gift of psychometry and charismatic healing are not limited to the clairvoyant and clairaudient states. Knowledge of the contents of an unopened letter; the history of both an object and its owners, both past and present; the ability to diagnose an illness merely by placing a hand upon the patient; or the ability to meet someone for the first time and know all about him, accurately predicting his future, are gifts which, although inexplicable, do exist.
